MARK EASTMAN

AB: "Well then, it brings up this obvious question: Ah, going back then to, in more ways than one, the beginning, they have ... we have Adam and Eve."

ME: "Umm-hmm."

AB: "And they, no doubt, had wild, unrestrained sex and had a child."

ME: "Umm-hmm."

AB: "Ah, but then that child ... in other words, there was a big problem with diversity then."

ME: "Well, um, remember, if, ah, as ... as I contended before: If ... if God – and He did make Adam and Eve – and if God being, ah, [an] omniscient being created them, we ... we presume He would have created them without any errors in the genetic code, so that ..."

ME: "... inbreeding at that time ..."

AB: "... would not have been ..."

ME: "... would not have been an issue.

It would not have produced mutants. Like today if you marry your sister or a cousin, you have a very great increased risk of a genetic error that they might have – that's a recessive – combining with a recessive gene that you might have. And then it gets expressed as some horrible disease.

There were no genetic errors at that time.

And it wasn't until after the Fall of Man and thousands of years of ... of the second law taking effect ..."

AB: "So we are a genetic mess right now? (!)"

ME: "We are a genetic mess!"

And I have a job because of that (!)"

AB: "Listen ... I understand. ...

Or as some wise person once said:

'Nothin' says lovin' like marryin' your cousin!'
